Question:

Referring to OCC-245 Interrogatory Response. Does the Company track tornadoes that impact the Company's assets?

Response:

The Company tracks damage to the electric distribution system, although there is no specific damage cause code for tornadoes. In practice, attributing damage specifically to a tornado is challenging during real-time storm response because tornado occurrence, intensity, and track are typically not confirmed until after the event through formal post-storm assessments conducted by trained meteorological damage survey teams. As a result, field damage is generally recorded based on observed asset impacts rather than a definitive tornado designation at the time of restoration. Even if a tornado-specific cause code existed, accurate classification would often require subsequent review and correlation with official weather assessments and documented tornado tracks.
